

The Tyne Mud Dragon

The Tyne Mud Dragon is a type of dragon.

Like most dragons, they have massive wings, huge jaws, a spikey back and a long tail. Typically, they are a muddy brown colour. However, some have been spotted that are a silvery green. Furthermore, their teeth are made of limestone and look like the ruins of Hadrian's Wall. The main feature of this dragon is that it does not breathe flames. They breathe Tyneweed. A few dragons of this variety have the ability to breathe on any creature and tangle it in Tyneweed, rendering it immobile.

The Tyne Mud Dragon lives by the River Tyne. It hides on the muddy banks and is difficult to see because most of them can become invisible. This dragon likes to hide inside the slimy mud. This makes them difficult to track down. They only come out at night and tend to move around the banks of the Tyne when it is raining or foggy.

Are Tyne Mud Dragon's dangerous? Many humans fear these dragons because they believe that they eat only people wearing waterproofs or cyclists. However, this is not true. They will steal brown trout and the occasional seal, but actually have never been known to attack a human. Indeed, in the summer, they are more likely to eat left over picnic food or dropped ice-creams than animals. This habit makes their skin glow a raspberry pink colour.

The most interesting thing about a Tyne Mud Dragon is that they perform wonderful dances. They can enchant people with their performances that have been known to last over a year long. Indeed, many people believe that Miss Rochester was actually taught to dance by a kindly Mud Dragon! It has been suggested that they might be able to perform dances in schools.
